The American Civil War was one of the most pivotal events in American history, and it also had a profound impact on Canada. Thousands of Canadians crossed the border to fight in the conflict, serving on both sides of the divide. Their motivations were complex, ranging from ideological beliefs to economic opportunity. Their experiences were equally varied, from fighting in some of the war's most famous battles to serving in more obscure roles. And their legacy is still felt today, in both the United States and Canada.

Canadians in the Union Army

The vast majority of Canadians who fought in the American Civil War served in the Union Army. They were motivated by a variety of factors, including their opposition to slavery, their desire to defend the Union, and their belief in the cause of freedom. Many Canadians also saw the war as an opportunity to gain military experience and to advance their careers.

Canadians served in every branch of the Union Army, from the infantry to the cavalry to the artillery. They fought in some of the war's most famous battles, including Gettysburg, Antietam, and Vicksburg. And they made significant contributions to the Union victory.

Canadians in the Confederate Army

A smaller number of Canadians fought in the Confederate Army. They were motivated by a variety of factors, including their support for slavery, their belief in states' rights, and their desire to defend their homes. Many Canadians also saw the war as an opportunity to gain military experience and to advance their careers.
