

Native Kid Becomes Congresswoman: A Story of Perseverance and Representation

Sharice Davids' journey to Congress was one that began on the Ho-Chunk Nation reservation in Kansas. She was raised by a single mother and grew up in a community where poverty and addiction were rampant. Despite the challenges she faced, Davids excelled in school and went on to college, where she studied political science.

After graduating from college, Davids worked as a lawyer for the Ho-Chunk Nation. In this role, she helped to protect the rights of her people and fought for their economic development. In 2018, Davids ran for Congress and made history by becoming the first Native American woman elected to the U.S. House of Representatives.
