Nkosazana Dlamini Zuma is a South African politician who served as Minister of Foreign Affairs from 1999 to 2009 and Minister of Home Affairs from 2009 to 2014. She is the former wife of former South African President Jacob Zuma. Dlamini Zuma is a leading candidate to succeed Zuma as President of South Africa.

Dlamini Zuma was born in Durban, South Africa, in 1949. She studied medicine at the University of Natal and worked as a doctor before entering politics. She joined the African National Congress (ANC) in 1975 and was elected to the ANC's National Executive Committee in 1991. After the ANC came to power in 1994, Dlamini Zuma served as Minister of Health from 1994 to 1999.

In 1999, Dlamini Zuma was appointed Minister of Foreign Affairs. She served in this position until 2009, when she was appointed Minister of Home Affairs. As Minister of Foreign Affairs, Dlamini Zuma played a leading role in South Africa's foreign policy, including its relations with the United States, China, and the European Union. She also played a key role in the negotiations that led to the establishment of the African Union.

In 2014, Dlamini Zuma resigned as Minister of Home Affairs to run for President of the ANC. She was defeated by Cyril Ramaphosa, but she remains a leading figure in the ANC and is considered a potential candidate for President of South Africa in the future.

Dlamini Zuma is a controversial figure. She has been criticized for her handling of the Marikana massacre in 2012, in which 34 striking miners were killed by police. She has also been criticized for her support of her former husband, Jacob Zuma, who has been accused of corruption and other wrongng.

Despite these controversies, Dlamini Zuma remains a popular figure in South Africa. She is seen as a strong and experienced leader, and she is likely to be a major contender in the race for the presidency in 2019.
